Janice Lee: Three Poems

Janice Lee · Wednesday, February 12th, 2020

?? or GHOST

from Separation Anxiety

we exist in relation to—or, we shuddered
as forever stared back our demons think something has gone
??, gone layered on thin once we lost it all forever even as we trained ourselves to need the animal less no need to gaze softly even if you are going to be cutting it all down

a cavitation speaks
too
with the susurrations of what we call compensation

in a prophecy:

thousands of sheep and goats and camels and oxen and sons and daughters thousands upon thousands bleeding in the dead of night

in a prophecy:

my head is split open with an axe and the deterioration of mind that was inevitable from the get-go finally finishes its course

in a prophecy:

the ghost of my dead mother eavesdropping as I sob willfully / woefully because I am so afraid to be alone that I bully everyone close to me into caring more about themselves than about the world whose cruel test of faith is all of this?

find yourself laying down the beautiful melancholy of language is tempting but you know already to turn away once in awhile and take a step in the opposite direction you know already to laugh after the tears but how?

with the redaction of knowing with all you will ever be a steady stone that enacts the performance of becoming
becoming
and when Benny shifts on the floor breathes deeply that too is the gesture of an entire life endearing its ghosts still reaching still: the darkness of light

God
when will we learn/unlearn it all?
