

Cultural Daily

Independent Voices, New Perspectives

Kelly Grace Thomas: Three Poems

Kelly Grace Thomas · Wednesday, January 15th, 2020

How the Body is Passed Down

My mother unzips the body.
Passes it down.

The dress tailored too tight. Leaves red indentation of buttons.

Pressed hard as apology.

My mother was still hungry. Royal with fridge glow. Learned that loneliness

eats with its hands.

My body has always been a window I cannot throw myself from. Breasts stomach thighs dimpled and swollen. Wetted wood in a house I was born into. But did not build.

I see my mother's hips every time I open

the fridge. Every time the fridge opens me.

My cabinets stocked with shame. What a mother feeds her young.

Now I know

a body can haunt itself. Be a fear

no one else believes in.
A ghost

that only says
my name.

(Previously published in the Los Angeles Review)

*

Burn the Boats

Because I believed somehow it was my fault: I never told anyone how great grandmother pinched the extra chub around my waist and asked who will keep you now? Pointed to every empty man not at our table. Told me I'm only as good as what I can please.

my only harbor. I carried this: a body full of broken boards and boundaries.
I never told anyone how my first love dropped threats like an anchor. Warned me what would happen if I took on water. Sinking always slipped between his speech. I believed being boarded equaled boat. So I floated for seven years subtracting what I had for another body. Parts of me couldn't fit inside his hands.

My first love never let me use his front door.
Instead gave me a dark porthole to climb through. I only remember this: in bed he would measure the circumference of my thighs.
Then beg for less. I became the smallest vessel I could steer. Every day he climbed through my story. Until I gathered enough distance to choose another name. I can't turn back.

I strike a single match.
Burn myself brighter.

The boats that built me smoke on shore.

(Previously published in Bayou Magazine)

*

Small Things

The webs of Walnut Creek are all spun white. In our new town, I notice each grocery store glare. Sticky stares follow Omid down each aisle.
Still my love keeps quiet hands. Wears kindness like salt and pepper stubble. I study him as he hums to houseplants.

It's been hard for me to learn a love so gentle. To believe him when he chants me close. Hushes gorgeous until I fall asleep. In the morning, he scrambles eggs.

Spatula in hand, he spots the lonely daddy-longlegs in a quiet corner. The wall weaver nestled next to light. He says, needing a home is such a small thing to be forgiven for.

He lets the delicate geometry stay. I am slow to learn how to handle a living thing. I study Omid as he smiles at spiders. I ask him how? His speech soft as saffron, breath, a net I lean against. He tells me he's been called a terrorist more times than he can count. His answer: save something smaller. Call each a guest. Leave all doors open.

Just because the world has called something poison, he says, doesn't mean we kill it.

(Previously published in Rise Up Review and is forthcoming in Best New Poets 2019)

(Author photo by Monique Mitchell)

This entry was posted on Wednesday, January 15th, 2020 at 12:00 pm and is filed under Poetry.
You can follow any responses to this entry through the Comments \(RSS\) feed. You can skip to the end and leave a response. Pinging is currently not allowed.

