PLACE MAKING: on the poetics of the water's edge.

Maurice Amiel · Wednesday, September 14th, 2016

Preliminary

The water's edge is not your usual place ... for one thing there are so many types of water bodies that have so many types of edges!

At the water's edge for instance is a wonderful book of photographs by J. Mayerowitz ... a book that can easily be taken for a National Geographic publication about Cape Cod, were it not so universal in its scope of situations that touch us deep inside.

As a matter of fact the book, which has been edited in various formats and at various prices to be affordable, has a poetic introduction by writer and editor Maggie Barrett that captures some of that universal call of the water's edge.

She writes: "For those of us born to the sea or lucky enough to spend our lives by it, we covet the seasons when we are left alone with it."

As one born to sand and sea and who has always lived in cities near water bodies or traversed by rivers, I have approached this post in a most personal manner. Selecting extracts from a suite of poems composed near my turning seventy that answered the need to find patterns of continuities and ruptures in my migrant life, one of these continuities being the nearness to water and its edges, came naturally.

Association with images taken at water's edges around Montreal, an island in the St Lawrence River, came also naturally ... enjoy!

At the water's edge ... No footprint is possible walking the water's edge

No foot print is possible in the sea, and that is what makes the water's edge so attractive.

The foot shaped sand pocket gathers the water which softens its edges, which ghosts its image, which sucks the pocket
down,
until next foot
comes down on the sand ...
but never in the sea,

which invites, rather, “eureka!” type experiences.

At the water’s edge ... the horizon was one the horizon is one

The horizon was one
and its distances many,
that carried envy,
fear,
And eventually hope.
(...)
Swimming to the depth-indicating buoy,
or to the offshore rock,
gave us a measure
of our endurance.
The changing colors
from here to there
told us of relative
calm,
or announced the prospect of storm

At the water’s edge ... the water’s edge was one the beaches are many

The water’s edge was one and the beaches many,
but not as many were to be its shores
from which there was to be no return.
You brought home
sand in your sandals,
and salt in your hair and on your skin,
and the sights of urchins,
and the feel of algae
under your feet.
Of such things was made the desire for the water’s edge, which became transmuted into piers and weirs and walks and benches and the shady places
of new shores,
issued from design imagination.

At the water's edge ... The air in the sea

the air in the sea

reaches deep under,
to be breathed by fish
gills.

The air on the sea running amok is captured in bubbles made of thin liquid film
which turns them into foam;

When these burst,
the air from the sea
reaches our

nose and lungs
with that iodine
smell,
breathed

into our memory gills.

The air and the sea
are made one
by life
and by memory,
having first issued
the former,
and then seduced
the latter.

At the water's edge ... Barnacles, algae and sea urchins barnacles, algae and sea urchins

don't inhabit the sea as much as they do
the rocks
in the sea;
at least that is where one finds them,
and their welcoming
scratches
slime
and pricks.
Take them out of the sea

and they dry out,
 and brittle away
 and mix
 with the sand.
 Until then swim around,
 don't walk
 on them rocks
 in the sea,
 where barnacles,
 algae and sea urchins
 peacefully
 people the rock.

At the water's edge ... at the continents mapped shoreline ...

the mapped shoreline

At the continents' mapped shoreline the blue parallel lines representing the oceans and seas
 stopped, ever so carefully so as not to smear the shoreline.
 Ever so carefully,
 (...)
 you must fill in the edges first and then fill up the rest of the ocean's map.
 Ever so carefully we dug holes and canals in the sand, and then,
 as if inaugurating
 them
 we allowed the waters
 to rise.
 No speeches and no champagne bottle breaking ... just the thrill of having the sandy edges remain firm;
 just the pleasure of seeing my map
 look like the perfect ones in the history books.

Transition

This post is the last of my long series of contributions to Cultural Weekly on the general topic of urban sociability: place making, city stills, live places, explorations in urban sociability, cityscape and landscape, echoes of the city, cityscape and time, and urban field notes.

The text of this post is taken from the poetic suite, “SOUNDINGS: on the continuities and ruptures of the migrant life,” which I composed between 2008 and 2010.

The images were taken in the sweet light of late summer in the general areas of Hudson, Quebec and Cap Saint Jacques on the island of Montreal,

Both text and images are herewith submitted for the enjoyment of the reader, as a “thank you” for your assiduity, and as an invitation to visit the nearest water body and to ponder your “place” at the water’s edge. As for me, it is a transition to whatever inspiration and inclination may allow ... at seventy six!
