Reuben Jackson: Three Poems

Reuben Jackson · Sunday, September 24th, 2023

7th Grade

My fear-stained life

Catches its breath

On a path
beneath

A crosstown
posse of maples

Who have no interest

In taking the bus fare
In my back pocket

I swear I heard the August breeze whisper

Are you sure you want to go back home?

*

Autumn 1975

I asked a certain maple
For its phone number

Not for me
I insisted

But
For my bedroom Window

So when The October wind
Comes to visit

The sound of Soon to be Vanished leaves

Knocking
Against the glass
Like inspiration

(Or a lover's head Meeting the bedboard)

Will conspire
To briefly evict

The posse
Of sorrows
From my Brain

Like a bartender Serving
A 90 proof
Glass
For Free

Sunday Afternoon East Glover, Vermont

Two lane roads
Twist like an awkward boy
At a house party

Chamber Of Commerce
Autumnal breezes say
"It's ok to be an October smitten brother in a corny plaid jacket which screams

“I too fell in love
With technicolor fairy tales
About this place”

I am a concrete weary man
En route to a tryst with trees
And silence

I wave to blushing hills-check the rear-view mirror for police
suffering from a draught of quotas

But now It is as calm as a day in which my blackness is unsettling to some people

Somewhere
God is watching football
On a flat screen

I share my wishes
With the sky
