Richard Jones: Three Poems

Long Distance Call to My Mother

I speak a few words, and then listen.
When silence and terror come between us, I'm torn: do I speak to reassure her or give the ruined mind its freedom, knowing my mother is stubborn and shall be heard. In her gibberish and stammering, I hear an iron will,
the desire to say a few clean sentences.
Because I am her son, she trusts me to translate broken, inarticulate syllables into questions her heart would ask.
I tell her the good and the bad, knowing she is strong enough to bear the truth.
And sometimes I say the sweet words, which she repeats back, annunciating clearly in her rich accent, a slow drawl that is like honey warmed by the sun.

Two Martinis

I have a glass pitcher I fill with ice before pondering which gin to pour, the Tanqueray and stalwart Beefeaters and Bombay Sapphire and Hendricks lined up like blue and brown books with the bottles of whisky and rye and sundry liquors and orange bitters, everything stored out of the light behind two shuttered doors that hide the little alcove bar's shelves of glasses, sink, marble lamp, and champagne bucket.
Today I am pouring a cup of cheap but organic gin called Art of the Still from Trader Joes where I buy the cheap cabernets I sip when writing.

 I take two glasses from the freezer, the cups frosted, and slip a half jigger of dry vermouth into the V of each glass before swirling and pouring it out, the sheen a thing of beauty to behold.
 (At Christmas I rinse the glasses with Cointreau to make the glass gleam.)
 The glass shining from the vermouth, I stir the pitcher slowly with a long glass wand to mix and melt the gin and ice, stirring delicately not to bruise the gin, then pour the glass full and adorn the rim with a long twist of lemon for my wife, mine being dirty with a splash of brine and a cocktail skewer with three olives.
 I wave the vermouth bottle over the drinks like a final blessing and call my wife, who after a long day needs the taste of winter and juniper and icy sunlight more than I do. Together we lift our martinis and hold them aloft for as long as we can, just thinking about the alchemy of cocktails.
 See us touch our glasses and take a sip, the dainty gesture more refined than a kiss?

Money

Then one day money grew on trees, flowering as dollar bills, oddly enough.
 George Washington looked befuddled hanging like a pear or an almond from millions of branches in thousands of orchards. And at night, coins fell like hail, making all kinds of noise and denting the hoods of new cars.
 At lunch in the cafeteria, if you bit into an apple you'd find a silver dollar.
 Money fell like snow on the mountains—great drifts and avalanches of bills.
 India's Ganges and London's Thames flooded their banks with currency notes, soggy pictures of Gandhi and the Queen.
 Flemish fields flowered with francs.
 The one-hundred cents of the Euro became as ubiquitous as grass, the Yen as common as rice.

The dunes of the Sahara and Kalahari?
Sun-dappled powdery flakes of gold for as far as a caravan could travel!
Even the trash cans of New York City overflowed with freshly-minted hundreds.
There was so much money in such abundance, money didn't mean the same thing anymore.
It was more like poetry, and came naturally, like the sun in the morning, like leaves to a tree.
