

Cultural Daily

Independent Voices, New Perspectives

Ron Koertge: Three Poems

Ron Koertge · Wednesday, March 26th, 2014

Ron Koertge (pronounced KUR-chee) writes fiction for Young Adults and poetry for everybody. The author of a dozen novels and novels-in-verse, his latest are Lies, Knives, and Girls in Red Dresses and Coaltown Jesus, both from Candlewick Press. As a poet, he has been awarded grants from the California Arts Council and the National Endowment for the Arts. He is also part of the Best American Poetry series (1999 and 2006). His latest books of poems are from Red Hen Press: Fever and The Ogre's Wife.

The poems have previously been published in The Ogre's Wife ("The Death of Hansel") and Fever.

The Death of Hansel

Gretel enrolls in night school. A creative writing class.
There are other women in their fifties. One keeps pointing her expensive breasts at the teacher. One has crazy hair and a pentagram. They're nice enough, though.

Gretel likes to sit with the young people. The girls treat her like a mom, spilling all kinds of secrets. Their idea of an endearment is to give her a joint or two in a Sucrets box.

Gretel likes the class. The teacher is bigger than she expected, strong like a woodsman. She's sorry when he hands out the last poem.

At home, she sits in the window seat and smokes.
The marijuana makes her sleep and before that she feels – she learned this word recently – phantasmagorical.

The moon is either there or she knows where it is.
A forest fills her little yard. A trail of white pebbles leads God-knows-where. She lets herself cry once a week and this is the time.

“Oh, honey,” she says. “I miss you so much.”

Kryptonite

Lois liked to see the bullets bounce off Superman’s chest, and of course she was proud when he leaned into a locomotive and saved the crippled orphan who had fallen on the tracks.

Yet on those long nights when he was readjusting longitude or destroying a meteor headed right for some nun, Lois considered carrying just a smidgen of kryptonite in her purse or at least making a tincture to dab behind her ears.

She pictured his knees giving way, the color draining from his cheeks.
He’d lie on the couch like a guy with the flu, too weak to paint the front porch or take out the garbage. She could peek down his tights or draw on his cheek with a ball point. She might even muss his hair and slap him around.

“Hey, what’d I do?” he’d croak just like a regular boyfriend. At last.

Found

My wife waits for a caterpillar to crawl onto her palm so she can carry it out of the street and into the green subdivision of a tree.

Yesterday she coaxed a spider into a juicier corner. The day before she hazed a snail in a half-circle so he wouldn’t have to crawl all the way around the world and be 2000 years late for dinner.

I want her to hurry up and pay attention to me or go where I want to go until I remember the night she found me wet and limping, felt for a collar and tags, then put me in the truck where it was warm.

Without her, I wouldn't be standing here in these snazzy, alligator shoes.

This entry was posted on Wednesday, March 26th, 2014 at 3:17 pm and is filed under Poetry.
You can follow any responses to this entry through the Comments \(RSS\) feed. You can leave a response, or trackback from your own site.