Zaji Cox: Three Poems

Zaji Cox · Wednesday, August 5th, 2020

The Turning

I stand in-between,
knowing and not knowing
of shifting leaves
against a turning season's skies,
trees that shed
or bloom with abandon hugging nests that are not quite built,
in a forest that is
not quite grown.
Grass in its greenest curls around my feet
in a tangled embrace.

A home in the not-quite-grown
I have found in the forest's youth.
Perhaps I am here
because I see a self.
Perhaps I am here
to wait,
watching
and hoping
for a yield to a growth both wild and new.

Summer

Beads

down my skin

I am exposed

it's too hot:

Heat exhaustion—I can't cover myself any more,
but I am compelled
because of the eyes like beads.

Men.

And women.

Too many. I can't be out here

I will faint from the heat

or the eyes

like sweat.

Beady

rolling

down my bare skin.

Too hot, it is too hot.

Water

The lie lives in my body.

Water is redundant while in constant redefinition.

Desire to become it, to become washed free of my deception;

to create new rivulets

where I have created untruths,

rests on me:

shame's adolescence.

One rule, eroded.

I came like an eel,

dark and sleek from the periphery.

Guilt claims us both—

I refuse it in full—

but the rule needed two to break.

My redefinition weighs heavy as sand.

Torrid waves weave Ocean's new self,

gorgeous

and indifferent.

I pray for its guidance;

it shuns me and weaves.

On and on, it creates its constant truth.

On and on I weave redundant,
to seek my constant truth.
